Congre

in the United States Senate who fear America may be influenced by what M. Clemenceau writes or says.

The United States government, meaning President Harding and Secretary Hughes, who are charged with the responsibility of foreign policy, faces an awkward and delicate situation. To reply to M. Clemenceau means taking official cognizance of what he says and reviving a controversy which the administration here is particularly anxious to avoid, especially since the press of domestic questions is making antagonisms and questions is making antagonisms and actions enough.

Foreign Questions Raised.

But M. Clemenceau's utterances and writings will not go unanswered. He has his defenders, as well as op-ponents, in this country, and what-ever may be the final judgment of the American people as to the concrete questions raised by the former French premier, he has already accomplished premier, he has already accomplished one object—he has stirred up foreign questions anew and focussed attention on them. There have been signs that European matters would be forced to the front anyhow by that group of international co-operationists in republican and democratic parties who believe the plight of Europe is inseparably interwoven in the prosperity of America and the future of our export trade, particularly agricultured.

He said also that France was the discordant element from the beginning to the end of the Washington conference on limitation of armament. It became known, he said, that France was against any real program of disarmament and now it is reported that the Washington treaties are resting in the pigeon holes of the French parliament and are not to be ratified.

"There is some reason," said Senator Borah, "for the American people to feel that France is militaristic."

Senators Oppose Plea.

Former Premier Clemenceau's speech in the Metropolitan Opera House urging greater participation by the United States in European affairs created a stir among members of the Senate yesterday.

Criticism of the address of M. Clemenceau was confined chiefly to anti-league of nations senators, who defeated United States ratification of the Versailles treaty, but Senator Hitchcock, who led the fight for the treaty, joined in, and Senator Caraway of Arkansas, ardent democrat and pro-leaguer, recalled that 100 years ago a French envoy sent to Says France is to Blame.

Comment of other senators on the Clemenceau address follow.

Senator Caraway—"France sent an envoy to the United States once before in an effort to enlist the aid of this country for the revolutionary government. That envoy was sent home. Clemenceau's speech would have been a good one if conditions were as he painted them. But they are not."

Senator Edge—"Clemenceau's appeal for assistance, with the threat of a new war as the alternative, does not come in good taste and will accomplish nothing. America has shown in the past her willingness to help France when she is in danger, and if danger threatens again I have no doubt the United States would help her again. But we want to do it in our own way and in our own time."

Senator Lodge of Massachusetts, chairman of the foreign relations committee, declined to comment upon M. Clemenceau's remarks. Senator Wadsworth of New York said the states would not join the first place, and only agreed to it on President Wilson's assertion that America under the first place, and only agreed to it on President Wilson's assertion that America which is not an alliance of all nations. M. Clemenceau asked President Wilson to submit the triple defensive treaty as a matter of good faith, because he, then the French premier, hoped the Congress would differ with Mr. Wilson. The truth is, the followers of Mr. Wilson were never enthusiastic about the triple alliance, but M. Clemenceau has seen alliance, but M.
